The mouse's cry, a natural signal for the fox

The Helen Baud Mouse Fox Call No. 75 reproduces the high-pitched cry of a mouse in distress, a vocalization particularly attractive to foxes. This type of sound naturally stimulates the predatory instinct and can attract the attention of nearby animals during observation or hunting sessions.

A realistic and easy-to-produce sound

Designed for ease of use, this call allows you to quickly obtain convincing sounds. The manufacturer recommends blowing short, sharp bursts to best reproduce the squeaks of a mouse. With a little practice, you can vary the calling sequences to enhance the realism of the situation.

A traditional craftsmanship in boxwood and brass

The boxwood body offers excellent acoustic qualities while providing a natural and elegant finish. The brass contributes to the overall robustness and ensures a long lifespan. This combination of materials is particularly valued for traditional bird calls intended for regular use.

A minimalist format that's always within reach

At only 77 mm long and weighing just 7 grams, this call is easily forgotten in a pocket or hunting vest. Its compact size allows you to take it everywhere without adding bulk to your gear, while remaining instantly available when the opportunity arises.

A popular accessory among predator enthusiasts.

Whether for wildlife observation, nature photography, or predator hunting, this call is a simple and effective tool. Its discreetness, sound quality, and careful construction make it a particularly popular model among users looking for a reliable, traditional call.

FAQ

What animal does this call attract?

This call is designed to reproduce the cry of a mouse in order to attract the attention of foxes and other predators sensitive to this type of vocalization.

How to achieve realistic sound?

It is advisable to blow in short, rapid bursts in order to faithfully reproduce the characteristic squeaks of a mouse.

What are the advantages of boxwood for a bird call?

Boxwood has excellent acoustic qualities and good resistance to wear, making it a material traditionally used for quality bird calls.
